and Chef Built What is the unique selling proposition of a smart home software and hardware product? Here's my easy-to-read guide to the business model and product design, illustrated with a stock photo of a woodworker. You know what Shmup is, right? It's a puzzle game in the genre of Space Invaders in which you control a fighter plane by pressing a specific key and shooting at flying enemies. Its success has propelled creators DFB into a new direction that led it to, in less than a year, become one of the most successful American indie video game companies. DFB's most recent release, Shmupcreator, has sold over a million copies. Not bad for a puzzle-puzzle hybrid that goes by the name of "retro shooter." With the success of the game, DFB's executives decided they wanted to take a step back and design their own video game. So they designed the same gaming experience in a new genre. Now they are on to designing the user experience of their very own smart home hub. The team has recently begun creating the products and is inviting the public to design the interface. This is an article I wrote a few months ago. It discussed innovation vs imitation. You may agree or disagree with everything said here. Everybody's imitating everybody else. Nobody's innovating. Setting the Fireworks alight may lead to pandemonium. I watched that happen when my fuel gauge display stopped working, so I started testing the electrical surge that was happening. My display was a custom SmartLabs product, which was an instant success. It attracted over fifty companies to want to sell in our preorders before they launched. After three months, the display was taken off the market when SmartLabs saw their display had been hacked via a USB cable. It shows that's useful to iterate quickly on every experience. DFB has also seen this: every company they have worked with has copied them. However, we copy anybody making a product we want to emulate. It's the butterfly effect. What we notice has happened to us, we observe and copy. Funnily enough though, it sometimes means some of the features we see copied aren't, but then we improve their implementation. Designing a smarthome hub is, in essence, the fastest possible iteration time

When using Fortran to assign a variable of a type different than the type of the variable being assigned, as described in this post, will the variable change type automatically? This related post answers this in the context of C-programming. A: A variable may have many names that refers to the same object. Fortran has no different way to define a variable than C does. The declaration of the variable, including type
