Google Summer of Code is a global program by Google to provide internships in open source technologies. Each year, Google invites developers across the world to take part in the program and work on various open source projects. As of June 1st, 2016, Google will sponsor a total of 15 students for the summer 2016. The selected students will work on 2 projects each, and they will receive a stipend of US$5,000. This can help to cover living expenses, while their mentors will mentor and guide them. Those who want to apply can visit the Google Summer of Code website. However, be aware that the deadline for applications has already passed, and only students who received direct acceptance have an opportunity to participate. A Useful Chrome Extension that Calculates the Cost of Products based on your Personal Income. TimePrices is an interesting Chrome extension that takes your earnings into account and shows you exactly how long it would take you to make up the cost of a certain item. It supports the most popular currencies and is very easy to configure. What this extension does is quite simple – when you place the mouse cursor over a product's price while browsing, it will display a tooltip that shows you how long it would take you to earn that amount. TimePrices supports three currencies, namely USD, EUR and GBP. It would certainly help if support for other currencies from around the world were introduced, but these should be sufficient for most users.

Useful extension that can be configured easily Naturally, you first need to set up your income before using this extension. Therefore, you should access the settings panel and enter your hourly rate, as well as daily, weekly, monthly and yearly salary. Several example profiles are included to help you set things up, including one based on Donald Trump's earnings, which isn't likely to be helpful for many users.

Blacklist websites or enable the extension just on certain pages In case you don't want the extension to be active on one or more websites, you can add them to the blacklist. Alternatively, you can add certain web pages to the whitelist to only view price conversions on these websites. Overall, TimePrices is a clever Chrome extension that helps you understand how expensive certain products are by showing their prices in relation to your income. It can be very useful, and it is also open-source.
